THE NEXT GENERATION

Joaquin Oliverria takes the reins at Foscari Interiors (foscariinteriors.com), the Euro-style custom cabinetry company founded by his mother, and ushers in a creative new future.

By Nadia Dakhkeli

What has it been like becoming CEO at Foscari?

It's been nothing but fun and challenging. I have been working for Foscari for almost 10 years to date—my mother, Monica Webb, started the company in 2007, so when I left high school I started working alongside her. It began as just a job but as the years passed by, I started training myself and learning from experience and my mother's knowledge, and seeing innovative and fresh ways that the bus could run. It caught my attention and made me want to proceed with the business, and with making a lot of internal changes.

Do you get a chance to work on the creative side of things? I am more involved in design and working alongside clients than ever, such as overseeing big residential projects that really allow me to work on more than a room—it allows me to expand my creativity and take on bigger projects, provide client solutions and optimize resources to make these high-end goods more accessible to clients. It's been a roller coaster of fine-tuning everything from the creative side to expanding our network of vendors.

What new home design trends are you excited about right now? Dark, bolder colors are very much in rather than the contemporary white, white, white that we saw in the early 2000s, as well as a lot of pastel colors, and lots of textures from way back in time like terrazzo and concrete.

What has it been like working with clients this past year? With everything that has been happening, it has definitely been a time of change in the way that we work with clients and projects. We never used to have online meetings; now everything is being done over Zoom calls. We are trying to make everything more accessible to the client and to the designers. And I do see in the market that people are spending more time at home, and they have more free time, so the demand for residential projects has been going up.

What is your top seller at Foscari? Kitchens would be the main thing that people associate with us, but we do full residential projects and have been getting a lot of requests for offices, closets and bathrooms as well.

And what is your newest product? In 2021, we came out with seven new colors for the Johnson Collection, which comes from Argentina. We are always expanding our vendors and resources in order to stay up to date.

"We are all fighting a common enemy, and we shall win. I have faith in the new generation. We will be able to gather, shake hands, hug, and dance again."

Monica's personal mission statement is to give you the best, from your heart.

For her, the definition of success changes with time. While it was focused on her career in the past, she now feels successful watching her sons become responsible and good men.

Monica admires and respects women in general. Being an entrepreneur and mom in a new country has been challenging for herself and for so many women who work hard and fight for a better space for themselves and a better world for their families.

Being dynamic is never stopping. It is facing adversity with solutions, continuing educating yourself and ambulating the best. Owning a College degree in Architecture, Design and Urbanism, Monica pursued her MBA, which allowed to serve her clients much better.

Monica is optimistic, not only about her business, which is now taken to the next level by her oldest son Joaquin Oliverria, but also about humanity.

JOAQUIN OLIVERRIA

FOSCARI INTERIORS
CEO/PRINCIPAL

Argentine designer Joaquin Oliverria hit the ground running as the newly appointed CEO of Foscari in the spring of 2020. Now, with a showroom expansion in the works, he continues to build upon the company's mission to create kitchens, bathroom and closet designs that are equally functional and beautiful.

As a teen, Joaquin was known for his distinctive visual perspective, always finding inspiration in beauty, music, and nature. Speaking candidly about his passion for design, he says, "The ability to create something so impactful in the way one lives, works and plays became ever-rewarding and bonded me with the design and architecture industry." In 2012, while pursuing a degree in interior architecture at the University of Houston, Joaquin worked as a senior design consultant and project manager at a high-end custom cabinetry studio. Shortly after, he joined his mother Monica Webb, the founder of Foscari, and he began maximizing his creative potential by discovering unexplored beauty.

With a strong focus on quality and integrity, Joaquin brings first-hand experience and passion into every project. His restless desire to innovate and improve, coupled with his natural adaptability, has been attributed to his firm's flourishing success within the custom cabinetry industry. While leading a team of exceptional designers, he meticulously sources products from exclusive manufacturers worldwide and builds collaborative relationships with clients to respect their vision, budget, and time frame. In the near future, he hopes to expand upon the company's philanthropic nature, giving back by designing spaces for local communities with limited resources available.
